P, p, Roman, P, p, Italick, P, p, English black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor in fact use, the Roman and Italick character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as of all the Roman letters, was originally the same with the Græcian, as Pliny informs us, wherein he is confirmed by ancient monuments. And indeed it is still but very little different, which may be seen, as in the rest, but more particularly in this letter, P being only P with the transverse and depending line drawn semicircular. The Greek P indeed itself differs no more, scarcely so much, from its original the Hebrew final פ when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the same in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, פ, pe, signifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure somewhat represents. Its place is the fifteenth letter in the English and Roman alphabets, and the first in the first order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation because of their nearness in sound and use; for p is only a softer b, as b is a harder p. The ancient Latins writ Burrhus for the Greek Περρῆς, and in their own language sometimes were at a stand whether to write b or p; as for instance in Fabius; whether obtineo, or optineo; since more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is also proportionably demonstrated in their very figure, P being a half B. Yea that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reason only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo, and bor of the third conjugation, as in nubo, scribo, labor, wherein the harder sound b, when a consonant is to follow, is changed into the softer, p; and this not only in declining such words, but the p from b remains also in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives; as from scribo comes scriptus, scriptura, scriptio, scriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages especially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew פרי and פיר; thus the Latin took pulpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλέφαρον and βυβων, and vice versa; and ab and sub from ἀπό and ὑπό. This their proximity in nature, sound, and use, is excellently denoted in the Greek and Latin figures, P and P, representing one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle sound, but also into its aspirate φ especially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λείπω, λείπω, λείπειν, where we find φ before a vowel changed into π before a consonant (as was before observed in Latin verbs of the same termination) and π again into φ. So in καλήμις, φως, φί, &c. gryps, gryphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologys is converted into p, as Περσεφόνη, Proserpina. To this first order of the mutes belong f and w, into which p is also changed, as πῆψω, figo; πείθω, fido; πίλος, filum; and as from λεπίς comes levis, so on the contrary from ovis is derived opilio. Nor doth p refuse the intercourse of her sisters of the second order. Hence lepus makes λαγώς, lupus, λύκος; nor of q which belongs to the same order. For from ἵππος, Æol. ἵκκος, comes equus; πότης, Ion. κότες, quoties; πῆ, ion. κῆ, qua. The correspondence of this mute with the sisterhood of the third rank is visible in πῆδον, studium; πέραν, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. for adpeto, adplico. Some kindred between p and the liquids is also averred by etymologists, but, in my opinion, is precarious, as being too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as in plaga, promo; but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, it goes before b, n, s, t, as in phasma, philus, phanaticus; dyspnœa; psephisma, psilæ; Ptolemæus, and diptoton. Here also it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchise a Greek word in which pt begins a syllable, they leave out either the former or latter, writing cubo, perna, tussis, for κύβη, πέρνη, πύσις. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, namely, l, m, r; as in culpa, campus, carpo. It likewise admits n, but always by her proxy m, as in compleo, compono, for compleo, compono. In derivatives from the Greek the initial p is sometimes omitted, as in latus from πλατύς, in uro from ουρῶ; which seems however to appear again in comburo for compuro. This letter appears also sometimes to be inserted in certain Latin words derived from the Greek, to hinder the collision of two vowels, as in lapis from λαῖς, in dapes from δαίς. P in the notes of the ancients, is read Publius, pondo; PA. DIG. Patricia dignitas; P. C. Patres conscripti; P. F. Publii filius; P. P. Propositum, Propositum publicè; *P. P. P. E. S. S. S. E. V. V. V. V. V. V. V. F. F. F. Q, Latin, Q, Ital. Q, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the ancient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern critics. Some of them took it to be superfluous; and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how, or whence, it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and writ pecunia loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum, Vid. Silburg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns finding many words of this kind; and others again judgeing it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who writ sometimes quando, and sometimes hirquus, quum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lictum, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but showed us the separate parts in this figure C < V. These writ sometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cuæ, cuid, which Vossius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, it is just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Tully, Ego quoque tibi jure favebo; because Donatus haveing informed us that in Cicero's time quoque was written, it is more probable that he pronounced that word queque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII, 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree with the sound of k. Besides, he saith in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks (which it certainly had, and for that reason was not adopted into their alphabet, of which more below) and this evidently proves the Romans founded it not as a k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the ancient writers nor the moderns were aware of, hath not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from β. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from koph they formed koppa; but finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, gave it a place among their numerals, calling it καππα επίσημον. For the same reason also, Kau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of Βαῦ επίσημον. On the very same account, ixade, or xade, or as we call it xad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numerals. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harsher, made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, of two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were א and ב, or B and V; in the second ג and ד, or G and D. In the third ה and ו, or H and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks refusing tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whose language was not perhaps much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greeks, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαῦ, or, which is the same, the Æolian digamma Ϝ made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks haveing learned that sound; and from the Greek Κόππα their

their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have founded quoppa, if the opinion of several ancient and modern critics may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original ῤ had in the Hebrew to distinguish it from ῤ, whence the Greeks had their Κάππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third ἐπίσημον Σάμπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tzade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken, not from the Greek Ζῆτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, because the Latin z hath a very hard sound, as the dental γ hath, whereas the Greek ζῆτα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it sometimes from them, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew γ, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII, 10. and in the same place will scarce allow γ, that is, F, to have a human sound; which surely is softer than γ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shown before. Hence it is evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three ἐπίσημα: and the doctor confesses the figure of z comes nearer γ, and the small z nearer to the final γ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from C, by shutting the semicircle, and obliqueing the perpendicular line; and C quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ῤ, when, in compliance with the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those since invented, whether necessary, or compendary: besides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea Quintilian further observes, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that so broad and harsh a sound should be taken into the Latin alphabet, which so embased the Roman, when compared with the Greek, elocution. I should next show its mutual intercourse with its sister mutes; but I have already made the longest preface to one of the shortest letters, and therefore shall only observe, that the resemblance and sound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial sister G, than to C or K her other sisters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, and that sometimes in the same syllable, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q always doth: which u, whether it be a vowel or a consonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, is better sought in that letter than here. Q in the notes of the ancients, signifies Quintus, or Quintius; Quint. Quintilius; Quaef. Quæstor; Q. B. V. Quod bene vertat; Q. S. S. S. Quæ supra scripta sunt; Q. M. Quintus Mutius, vel Quomodo.

R, Greek ρ, ρ, Hebr. ר Resch, from רִאשׁ a head, which its figure in some sort represents, in Syriack ܪܐܝܬܐ, Roē, from which comes the Greek ρ, Rhō. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake, or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted the Hebrew Q, and considered that the figure of the Greek rhō was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage, or tail, was added by them to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most ancient Greeks had both P and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critick and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27, where we find this form R at least seven times; to omitt what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the ancient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. P and R, took the former easy conjecture if none have made before, must have happened by not observing the ancient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhō. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, though undeservedly, being in fact, τὸν ἡμιφώνων γενναϊότατον, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calleth it; and therefore might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. But whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before, or after, this letter, is not agreed on: reason, and the custom of the Æolians, who sometimes prefixed γ and sometimes β before it, make for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhannus, rhator, rhinoceros, lected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rosa, and in other words either omitted or inserted it at pleasure, as in raphanus and rhapbanus, ramphæa, or rhombæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it at all; and indeed this sound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but so vibrated by a quaver of the tongue and allision on the teeth, that it makes a sound like the grining of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, gave it so soft and lisping a sound, that in writing they sometimes omitted it, calling the Etrusci Thusci, or Tusci; and especially before s; thus Ennius writ profus, rusus, for prorsus, rursus: which is less to be wondered at, because the most ancient Latins doubled not their consonants. Yea, the sound of this lisped r was so near that of its neighbour s, that they writ asa, casmen, Papyssi, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers still, particularly in the prince of poets, where *arbo*s and *hono*s frequently occur; and *labo*s, *vapo*s, &c. in vowels, as if it had been little more than a breatheing; as in murex, nurus, from μύραξ, νύδος. But to proceed: Though the grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to say nothing of the rest here, this has not only an intercourse with the sisterhood, but often with several of the mutes. First with her sister l, as from puer comes puera, puella; from καυθήλιος, cantherius; and as cæulius was anciently written for cæruleus, so on the contrary we find latiaris for latialis. With her sister m the instances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from δῶρον and πλήρης are formed donum and plenus, so from μόνον Æol. μένον, and from μόνα, come merus and mora. In some words r and n are written indifferently, as in æreus, or æneus. I will instance as briefly as I can the intercourse of this liquid with some of the mutes: and first with c, as in paucus from παῦρος; with d, as in corium from κόριον, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus. Anciently also ar in many words was used for ad, as in arlabi, arfnis, arversus; for adlabi, &c. Lastly it is used with g, as from ἀγν comes agna, serere from seges. This letter is used by or Ro. signifies Roma; R. C. Romana civitas; R. G. C. Rei gerendæ causâ; R. F. E. D. Rectè factum, & dictum; RG. Regis filius; R. P. Res publica, or Romani principes; R. R. R. F. F. F. Res Romana ruet ferro, fame, flammâ.
